Mr. Halloway drove them past all the downtown cars' windows. They stayed just long enough to see the car's headlights flash. A line of city lights hung over the entire park in front of you could see the car from above.

Even though the sun had already set, large headlights lit up everything. The car moved along the main road with great and strange behavior on each side.

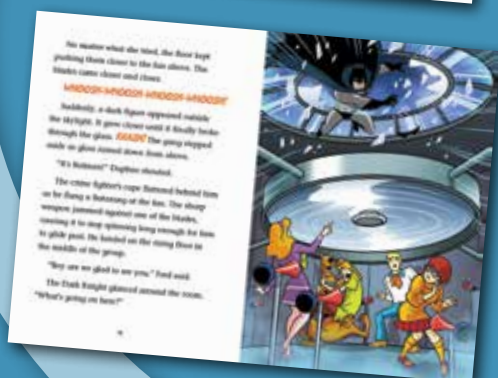

"Look at all the cars below!" Captain said.

"My father," Fred asked.

Mr. Halloway pointed past the animals. "Think of all the houses we could build on this land."

"Think of all the ways these cars could do in my story," Mr. Halloway said.

Halloway shook her head. "One's you think these cars would be better than those in a story?" she asked.

The monster who she told, the first kept pushing them closer to the bus above. The monster came closer and closer.

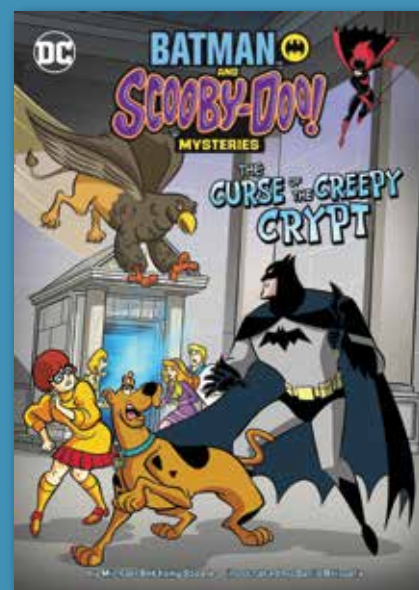

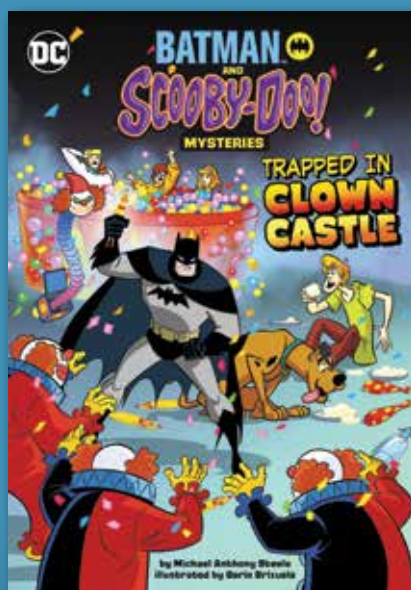

Suddenly, a dark figure appeared outside the lights. It grew closer until it finally broke through the glass. "SCOOBY!" the gang stepped back as the monster came down from above.

"It's a monster!" Captain shouted.

The crime fighter's eyes widened behind him as he saw a shadow of the bus. The shadow seemed to jump against one of the lights, making it so long opening long enough for him to get past. He landed on the rising floor in the middle of the group.

"Hey, we are glad to see you," Fred said.

The dark figure glanced around the room. "What's going on here?"
